Selling scrunchies saving species

STEPHANIE LAI
INTERROBANG

A Fanshawe College grad and her business partners are mixing social responsibilities with entrepreneurship.

Samantha Laliberte, a former student of Fundraising and Human Resources – now co-founder of lifestyle brand Ezzy Lynn – sells scrunchies to save endangered species through the World Wildlife Fund.

“Each product’s design is inspired by an endangered animal,” said Sonja Fernandes, a co-founder. “We want to be brand ambassadors for these animals to educate people while we sell scrunchies.”

“For every 25 we sell, we symbolically adopt one of those animals through the World Wildlife Fund.”

The pair met – along with their third partner – through what was formerly known as BizInc, now called Leap Junction.

“We all loved business. We loved entrepreneurship,” Laliberte said. “We bonded over being women, and there [weren’t] many women in that space, so we started a business together.”

Fernandes – a Philosophy major – has had experience since high school.

“In university, I started a small marketing consulting company helping small businesses with their online presence and social media,” she said. “I also started a not-for-profit organization called Volunteer Ya that still exists today.”

Laliberte says she knew she still wanted to focus on the social aspect of business when the trio began the business.

“I actually like meeting with people and fundraising,” she said. “When the social model for social enterprises came out, that was really attractive to me, because I could bring both passions and both skills and be fulfilled that way.”

One example is shoe company TOMS’ one-for-one model.

Fernandes’ definition of a social enterprise is not a legal definition.

“The common theme is that it’s a business, and it sells a product and has some sort of social mission or purpose,” she said. “It’s not about financial return or social return – it’s about financial and social.”

So when the three young women created Ezzy Lynn, they thought about their target market.

“We wanted [our target market] to be other young women like ourselves that had similar interests,” Laliberte said. “We couldn’t figure one specific style that fitted us.”

“It wasn’t just boho; it wasn’t just corporate chic; it wasn’t just grunge/hippy. We like to play with different fashion trends; we felt our target market would do the same.”

So then they created personas for Ezzy and Lynn to represent the two sides of someone’s personality.

“If you’re more of a Lynn, you might work in a corporate environment,” Laliberte said. “You love networking, and you’re more likely to wear a scrunchie and a sock bun or a sleeked-back ponytail.”

“When you go out at night or on the weekend, maybe you want to let loose a little bit – that’s more of your Ezzy side ... Someone like that would wear more of our colourful, printed scrunchies in a top knot or side pony.”

Ezzy (Esmeralda) and Lynn are also the middle names of Fernandes and Laliberte.

They included their third partner into the company name too, though.

“When [Bianca] joined us, we couldn’t fit her name into the name anywhere, so she represents the jellyfish logo because [it’s] her favourite animal,” Fernandes said.

contribution, they’ve also been working with Goodwill.

“Goodwill has a program called Pivotal Services [that] creates jobs for people who face barriers,” Laliberte said. “So we are funding a sewing lab at Goodwill now, and there’s going to be five seamstresses actually making our scrunchies for us to help us scale.”

“We’re really excited about our growth and our scalability from that and how we can be even more socially conscious in the creation of our products.”

Ezzy Lynn also recycles old clothing from Goodwill to make the scrunchies.

“This is the most successful I’ve ever felt in my life,” Laliberte said. “Being able to quit a corporate job where at the time it felt great.”

“Any opportunity where we get to tell people what we’re doing, you never know who’s going to read it or hear it and we’re going to shake that right hand.”

The ladies of Ezzy Lynn will be in F Hallway February 10 from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. selling scrunchies and spreading word about their brand’s message.

Products can be found at Leslie’s and Moksha Yoga on Richmond Street and Purdy Natural on Dundas Street.

International Week: Where are you from? We’re running out of phone numbers

RANJINI CHAKRAVORTY
INTERROBANG

Fanshawe International Week opened with flash mobs everywhere in the college surprising staff and students and welcoming them to a warm opening to the weeklong event, which began February 2.

Later that afternoon, students connected with all diversity and cultures. Different forms of dance, music and buzzing melody from different cultures engaged the international students who attended.

The Immigration Information Seminar on the second day of International Week welcomed Mohamed Salih as guest of honour, who spoke about his journey from Sudan to London’s city council.

He told a story about a little boy from Sudan who came to Canada as an immigrant with his mother and sister, which inspired the journeys of many international students present at the seminar.

“I came to Canada and lived in an area with absolutely no diversity at all,” Salih said. “Learning about the culture, picking up the language and the adopting to the multi diversity lifestyle has been a challenge as well as an enriching journey.”

Salih encouraged attendees to unite with diversity. He promised international students a better transit system, and, being on the tourism committee, he would focus on making downtown London a wonderful and amusing destination for the people from around the world to meet, cheer and celebrate.

Director of London Economic Development Commission Robert Collins presented a short and sweet presentation about living in London and the dynamic avenues of entrepreneurship and ever-blossoming technical job market.

Fanshawe College was flocked with diversity and cultural events all week.

London needs a new area code

STEPHANIE LAI
INTERROBANG

A new area code will be introduced in the southwestern Ontario region starting in June 2016.

Currently, the area codes 519 and 226 serve municipalities such as London, Windsor, Kitchener-Waterloo, Guelph, Brantford, Sarnia, Woodstock, Stratford and Owen Sound.

A press release from the Telecommunications Alliance says the new area code 548 will be introduced due to the “growing demand for new telephone numbers.”

Project Manager of the Canadian Numbering Administration Glenn Brown says the implementation of 548 is due largely to advances in technology.

“We have a whole lot of advances in technology – cell phones being one – cell phones, tablets and all of those,” he said. “You take all of that combined, and that’s why we’re starting to have a shortage, and the shortage is not just cell phone numbers, it’s the first three digits of the phone number.”

It’s also because southwestern

Ontario is a “huge geographic area.”

Area code 519 was introduced in the early ‘50s; it wasn’t until 2006 that 226 rolled out.

Brown says 548 was on the horizon after 226 was put in.

“We were monitoring this as we were putting in 226,” he said. “Because it’s such a large area.

“Originally, based on the way the forecast were working, we were looking to do relief this year. Based on a year ago, our results indicated we were not going to need a new area code in southwestern Ontario until the following year. We’re always monitoring it.”

Brown says the implementation of 548 will affect anyone who uses a phone, not just newcomers or students.

“Let’s say one of your neighbours gets this new number and you ask, ‘What’s your number?’ and they give you the 548 number. Now it’s impacted the person who has the number,” he said. “It also impacts you who wants to call them.”

The press released also says that the introduction of the new area code will not affect special numbers like 9-1-1.

uWaterloo not the only school criticized for staying open

FRANCIS SIEBERT

The University of Waterloo was criticized February 2 for remaining open while all other schools in the region – including the University of Laurier, Conestoga College and the University of Guelph – were closed because of weather conditions.

But uWaterloo wasn't the only school being criticized for being open the morning after the February 1 snowstorm. Fanshawe College students also took to social media to voice their complaints.

Over 40 people responded to Fanshawe's message on Facebook saying that the St. Thomas, Woodstock and Simcoe campuses were closed but that the London campus was open. More than 30 responded to the same message on Twitter.

"I drive from Woodstock everyday, there no way I'm even touching my car in this weather #areyoucrazy," wrote Twitter user @jessejamesdrums.

"Very disappointed in how little you cares for the safety of students, since you stayed open you will cause car accidents !!" wrote @J_Lambert31.

"Thanks for taking the students and faculties lives into consideration. It's a goddamn blizzard out there, you cancel all the other campuses classes but, still want the rest of us to risk it. Stupid. I'm staying home," wrote Facebook user Steve Mc.

my excuses acceptable during mid-terms. Thanks for forcing me into this dangerous activity for the sake of an exam," wrote Haley Barnhardt.

One of Fanshawe's tipping points when choosing whether to close the college or not because of weather conditions is whether public transportation operates. The London Transit Commission was operating on February 2.

The other tipping point is whether the college can clear sidewalks, parking lots and streets on campus fast enough to maintain accessibility. This was also the case, according to Robert Earle, manager of Fanshawe's emergency management office.

"This is an individual choice that people have to make," he said. "If they feel the weather conditions compromise their safety or their personal circumstances dictate that they're not going to be able to get to campus, then that's a choice that they have to make."

Earle points out that there is provision within the policies of the college that weather conditions is an excusable absence.

"Everything boils down to a personal choice," he said.

uWaterloo said in a statement that its two priorities when choosing whether to stay open or to close are also accessibility on campus and public transit operations.

"In our judgment it was safe for students, staff and faculty to get to and move around the University of Waterloo," uWaterloo said in the statement.

Waterloo Region's public transit, Grand River Transit, was also operating that day.

Melanie Garrett, a third-year student at uWaterloo, started a petition on Change.org for the school to re-evaluate its weather policies.

"The University of Waterloo students frequently risk their safety getting to classes when most other academic institutions are closed due to dangerous weather conditions," she wrote on the page. "We, as students, need to make it very clear that we will not stand for leaders who constantly show a blatant disregard for our safety."

The petition had over 4,000 signatures as of February 4.

New fitness centre announced

FRANCIS SIEBERT
INTERROBANG

Fanshawe College and the Fanshawe Student Union announced on January 28 the expansion of Fanshawe's Community Fitness Centre.

The proposed expansion will allow for larger fitness facilities as well as the grouping of wellness programs all under one roof.

The planned expansion will be three storeys high. The first floor will be dedicated to wellness programs, such as message therapy, a juice bar and a pharmacy, while the second and third floors will be for fitness programs, such as cardio and strength training and group-exercise rooms.

The building will also include a rock-climbing wall spanning the three floors.

"Some people find refuge in working out, and some people find refuge in quiet areas," FSU President Matt Stewart said. "We need to be able to support not just one demographic but all demographics around the school to be able to provide them with facilities that cater to their needs."

The expansion of the fitness and wellness centre will not translate to an increase in student fees until the opening of the building. Part of student fees students are already paying will go towards the new building, however. The FSU is looking into giving back to Fanshawe graduates who are contributing to the expansion.

Construction is planned to start this summer and the opening is planned for January 2017.

"A new health and wellness centre gives the options for students for dealing with the day-to-day stresses that they can fall into throughout school life," Stewart said. "As the student union who looks after the students, we need to be able to provide facilities that they can utilize to deal with their stresses."

The FSU and Fanshawe identified in May 2011 expanding the Community Fitness Centre and fitness and wellness services as a high priority. The existing facility was built in 1993, and student population as increased by 68 per cent since then.

The FSU announced in May of last year that it would be contributing $24 million over 25 years to the expansion of the fitness centre.

"With the growth of the college and an increased focus on fitness and wellness, this facility will be on more asset to ensure Fanshawe offers premier college learning and student life experience," said Fanshawe President Peter Devlin in a media release.

Fanshawe to implement a sexual assault policy and protocol

FRANCIS SIEBERT
INTERROBANG

Ontario's colleges, including Fanshawe College, have created a draft of a sexual assault and violence policy and protocol that is to be implemented by March 31.

The presidents of Ontario's 24 colleges endorsed a uniform framework at a meeting on January 26 in Toronto for the new policy and protocol. It intends to give students and staff a right to work and study in an environment free of sexual violence.

"Our campuses must be safe and welcoming and we must ensure immediate and effective help is available to victims of sexual assault," said President and CEO of Colleges Ontario Linda Franklin in a news release.

The colleges are now finalizing the policy and protocol, consulting with government officials, student leaders, the Ontario Public Service Employees Union and others.

Fanshawe Vice-President of Student Services Cathie Auger says Fanshawe will be developing its own sexual assault policy and protocol based on the Ontario Colleges' policy and protocol framework.

In implementing the policy, colleges commit to assisting victims of sexual assault, ensuring internal investigations are available and ensuring that victims are believed and are the final decision-makers. They also commit to teach students and staff about sexual assault and violence as well as how to respond to disclosures of sexual assault.

The draft policy states that privacy and confidentiality of victims of sexual assault and violence should be "strictly observed." It also includes definitions, such as what constitutes sexual assault, consent and stalking; information on filing complaints; and what to do if you've witnessed a sexual assault or are a victim of sexual assault.

Franklin says information about sexual assault and violence will be easily accessible and actively promoted.

The colleges are also putting pressure on the provincial government to make changes to better support victims, such as offering a 24-hour emergency hotline and allowing more colleges and police to share more information with each other.

"The FSU is involved and will be involved," said Paul Massé, the business manager for the Fanshawe Student Union. "Although it's a college policy, it will be a policy that the FSU will support operationally."

The presidents of Ontario's colleges voted unanimously in favour of a province-wide sexual assault and violence policy in November of last year at the Colleges Ontario conference.

The decision came after the Toronto Star found in an investigation last year that none of Ontario's colleges had special policies regarding sexual violence. Only nine of Canada's 78 universities had sexual assault policies, the Star reported, including Western University.

Victims who were sexually assaulted on campus are advised to contact Campus Security Services at 519-452-4400.

Students interested in reading the draft policy and protocol can do so at tinyurl.com/o5od7nm. They can voice their opinion by contacting Fanshawe Student Union president Matt Stewart at 519-452-4430 ext. 6314 or at fsupes@fanshawec.ca.

"Protecting everyone on our campuses is a priority for every college in the province," Franklin said. "This is an ongoing process to promote awareness, education and clear policies that reinforce that safety is a paramount priority in Ontario's colleges."

Monsters of Schlock kept it crazy in Forwell Hall January 28.

Wacky, weird and twisted stunts by Monsters

JERROLD RUNDLE
INTERROBANG

Students were treated on January 28 to the "most extreme two man circus side show county magic extravaganza," as the Monsters of Schlock explain themselves. Forwell Hall hosted Burnaby Q. Orbx and his brother Sweet Pepper Klopek make up a duo that has been set on fire, cut, had animal traps released upon and pulled weights with their eyelids to name a few feats in their repertoire.

"Well it's a great school," Orbx said. "We played [at Fanshawe] now for four years in a row. It's one of the great shows of the year."

The brothers spiced things up by adding a new variable to its Fanshawe stop.

Orbx started the night by letting a student push and pull a seven-inch nail into Orbx's nasal cavity, followed later by Klopek having playing cards stapled to his face, chest and buttocks, only to guess the proper card each time.

"The last one here was probably the top five shows ever – it was just wild," added Klopek.

"As soon as he walked out, he set one foot and everybody went nuts and it was jam packed in there ... it's one of those things that we like to foster a good time, and as long as the people are having fun, and we're having fun, then that's all we're really looking for."

Fanshawe's shot at glory? The duo attempted to break the most tables suplexed in a minute at the Fanshawe event. The record was broken when Orbx suplexed Klopek at the 58-second mark into the final eighth table.

The show is part of a larger tour across Ontario campuses where The Monsters will be breaking new records or current records they already hold.

The previous stop at Algonquin in Ottawa saw Pepper have 13 animal traps released on him in under a minute, shattering the previous record of six.

"We had raccoon traps, rabbit traps, coyote traps, mink traps, stoat traps, ferret traps," Orbx said.

"Chinchilla," Klopek said. "Well that's illegal to trap chinchilla here but ... we even had time to spare. We just had no more traps [for] this guy."

Despite the ridiculous nature of their jobs, it's not a Jackass movie for the two. They sounded more like engineers, planning for every possible mistake, every danger that could happen.

"That was one of the things – with the most mousetraps on the tongue in a minute, which was Pepper at Call The Office in [April 2014]," Orbx said. "You had to have to type of mousetrap, which is a Victor mousetrap, which is available worldwide so that you know someone in India could attempt it as well as somebody in Canada."

It's about planning and risk management, something Orbx liked to call his risk-to-benefit analysis.

Who could forget the duo's never-smiling clown pushing a nail through wood with his bare hands, popping a balloon underneath – between a male student's uncomfortable thighs? Or lifting weights with eyelids, stopping a fan with your tongue and face?

Nothing is too extreme for the brothers of Monsters Of Schlock and their Looney Tunes-style stunts.

Highbury-Oxford collisions at a high in 2014

FRANCIS SIEBERT
INTERROBANG

The Highbury Avenue and Oxford Street intersection had the second highest number of collisions in 2014 in London, according to a London Police Service media release.

There were 77 collisions at the intersection last year, one short of the Wellington Road and Commissioners Road intersection.

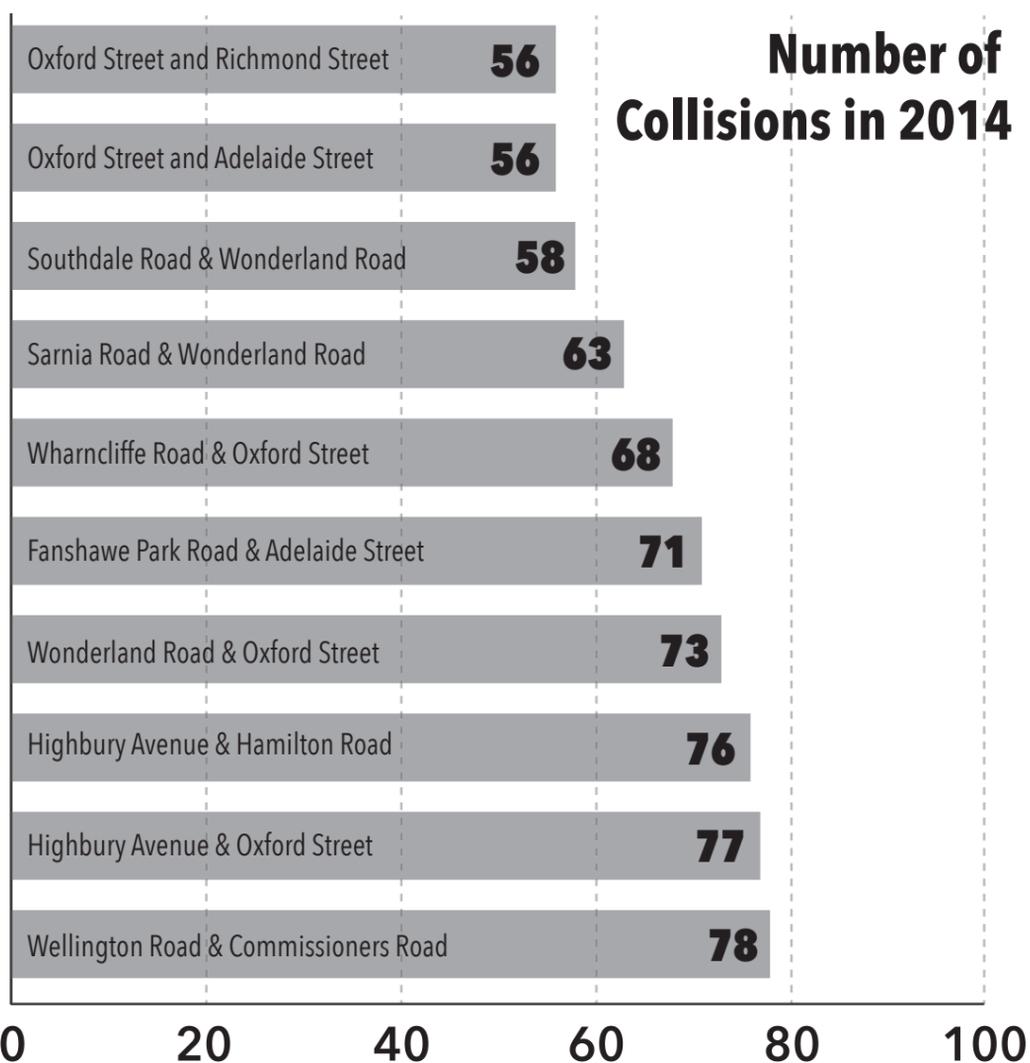

Other intersections on Oxford were also on the list, including Oxford and Wonderland Street with 73, Oxford and Wharncliffe Road with 68 and Oxford and Adelaide Street and Oxford and Richmond Street with 56 each.

There were over 10,000 collisions last year in London. This is the highest number of collisions in the past five years and an increase of six per cent from 2013. LPS gave 2,187 offence notices to drivers holding or using hand-held electronic communications devices, an increase of 30 per cent from the previous year.

The fine for driving while holding or using a hand-held communications electronic devices in Ontario is $280.

"What dollar amount can you put on somebody's life?" said Fanshawe College Spec. Const. Brent Arseneault. "It's time to buckle up, phone down, pay attention to the road and stop an unnecessary act."

Campus thefts increasingly Dodge-y

FRANCIS SIEBERT
INTERROBANG

Campus Security Services is reporting an increase in vehicle thefts at Fanshawe College's London campus, according to a media release.

Two older Dodge pickup trucks have been stolen on campus in January, while no vehicles have been stolen last semester. Thirty-nine pickup trucks have been stolen in the city between January 1 and 30. Only 12 were stolen during the same period of time last year.

"Do everything that you can to secure your vehicle(s)," said Fanshawe Spec. Const. Brent Arseneault.

Campus Security Services advises to never leave running vehicles unattended, to park in well-lit areas, to never leave valuables in plain sight and to keep vehicle registration and proof of insurance with you at all times.

Suspicious activities should be reported to Campus Security Services at 519-452-4242.

Many of the World's beaches, including some in California are artificial.

Rumours of Grace: In search of the perfect beach

MICHAEL VEENEMA
RUMOURS OF GRACE

The other day, I was saying to someone that if oil prices remain low, the economies of some Middle East countries will take a hit.

Well, if they can no longer profit from the sale of oil, maybe some of those countries can try exporting sand. It seemed humorous to imagine boatloads of sand replacing boatloads of oil. Who would pay $120 or even $40 – wholesale – for a barrel of sand?

It seemed funny until someone said to me that many of the beaches of California and Florida are artificial.

What?

A little research online says this is true. Finding sand to enlarge famous beaches has been going on for some time. One example is Miami Beach. From 1976 to 1981, sand was dredged up from the seabed to replenish the beach at a cost of $64 million.

This brings to mind the issue of how much we expect from this planet.

There are two remarkable stories of the creation of the world, which suggest that if anything, we should reduce that demand.

In one of them, the creation springs from deep within the being of the creator. He speaks and the visible universe comes into existence. In the second he is a sculptor, shaping human figures and then breathing life into their nostrils, transforming into a living beings. He plants a garden for these humans to inhabit and enjoy. These stories are found on pages one and two of the Christian and Jewish Bible.

Thanks to science, our understanding of the created world has become extremely complex and fascinating. We have even more reason to see the mindfulness of our world and to appreciate the patient and intricate work of the creator – God.

But we don't treat it well. Even though we are completely informed about the problems of fossil fuels and global warming, we continue to fly. We do this even when much of our flying is not necessary but is done in the pursuit of luxury – in the hunt for that perfect.

Even though we know that fossil fuel-based land transportation is among the killers stalking our planet, we continue to build economies around the internal combustion engine and around road infrastructure.

It is as if we are crazy. We know we are killing the planet, but we hardly dare to step out of destructive habits. We build college programs on the assumption of an endless supply of cheap energy. No one is taught to grow his/her own food. Many are taught to become merchants of the perfect beach.

There will be much weeping over the losses to the Canadian economy if the oil sands turn out to be unprofitable because of falling oil prices. And yet, there should be street parties in celebration of any efforts to cease the development of fossil fuel extraction and use.

What is needed is a recovery of an appreciation for the origins of the creation in God. If he invested his thought, will and words into the stupendous planet and even more stupendous universe we inhabit, should we not treat the earth with greater care?

Shouldn't we cease to harm it?

We have devalued the creation and need to re-value it. Perhaps the easiest way that we can do that is to demand less of it, which is simpler than it sounds. Any of us can purchase a smaller car than we want. Or we can drive slower, which quickly reduces fuel consumption – or less. Some of us can purchase local farm produce.

By demanding less, we will have more. When consumption and pollution levels drop, our planet will become healthier. Yes, economists will complain. But they also did so before slavery was abolished. Yet they survived along with the rest of us.

The removal of the blight of slavery outside of the Middle East and Africa where it persists, has made our world a more humane place. The removal of the blight of endless consumption will also make our world a better place.

We need to do the right thing, on a small scale, if that is all we can do, and on a larger scale to the best of our abilities. The economy will adjust.

Michael Veenema was a chaplain at Fanshawe College until 2004. He lives in Nova Scotia, where he is a pastor and a chaplain. He continues to write.

Public sector unions strike again

VICTOR DE JONG

If the Canadian healthcare system was a private company, it would have closed up shop and headed south for cheaper labour years ago. Despite that the funding for healthcare has grown much faster than the pool of money it's drawn from, organizations like the Ontario Medical Association are in panic mode, attempting to whip up a frenzy of indignation over a government that supposedly won't put healthcare first.

It's reminiscent of the teachers' refusal to participate in extracurricular activities several years ago, during which scholarship opportunities for thousands of high school students were jeopardized because clubs and teams were suspended during the strike. There was similar moralizing about the sanctity of education and that somehow this was teaching children what it really means to live in a developed society.

Unfortunately, they were teaching the kids a crucial lesson that still rings true: if your union can convince people that it's about morals and not money, they get more money.

Several groups of public sector employees are seeking new contracts this year, including elementary teachers and the provincial police. The government of Ontario has stated its commitment to a zero per cent increase in public sector wages in an effort to eliminate the province's deficit by 2018.

It's a strategy that is doomed to fail, and that's almost the point. If you publicly state the intention of a pay freeze, even a minuscule one percent increase will be considered a victory. If the provincial government had committed to a two percent increase, the union would be aiming for three. The key is managing expectations.

If Ontario shut down the provincial government today and continued collecting all of its revenues, it would still take more than two years to pay off our provincial debt. The ongoing explosion of our debt is hard to care about when it's seen in the broader context, because almost every provincial and federal government is in debt to a greater or lesser extent.

To put it in perspective, consider this: according to the Fraser Institute, over nine per cent of the provincial government's budget is spent repaying the interest on the money it's borrowed. The lower the credit rating of the province, the higher that percentage gets. Not to mention that the Ontario credit rating was downgraded this past December, meaning investors see an increasing potential that Ontario might not be able to pay back its loans.

Imagine that the provincial government is that young and carefree college student. Sure, absorbing that debt to privatize power delivery seemed like a good idea, and maybe they'd had a few drinks before they decided to bail out big auto, but those were one-time expenses.

Wage increases are massive ongoing expenditures. Public sector salaries make up a huge portion of the province's overall budget obligations. The objective of the public sector unions is to make this about morals and not money, but morals won't pay our way when the money runs out.

Ron Hawkins and The Do Good Assassins play at Call The Office

JERROLD RUNDLE

Influential to the Canadian indie music scene since the '90s, Ron Hawkins started with The Lowest of the Low, gaining a gold record with Shakespeare my Butt, later forming Ron Hawkins and the Rusty Nails. Hawkins is now fronting The Do Good Assassins, a bluesy rock and country band currently on tour.

Hawkins wasn't shy discussing the changing indie landscape.

"It's sort of drying up of options on the large-scale with things like radio and change in format for [the] music industry in that there are fewer brick-and-mortar CD/vinyl stores around so distribution chain big labels have dwindled," he said. "But the Internet flourished with YouTube [and] all kinds of ways of social media to get your stuff out ... democracy of the Internet, it's good, but there's a glut of shit."

He says that it's due to the same tools at all levels of musicians' hands that leads to too much out there and no way to discern between good and bad.

Playing at Call The Office on February 13, the act will focus on the recently released Garden Songs, a 10-song collection of new and backlogged country-infused hits, which will be paired with a more blues-rock album already recorded and waiting for release early next year.

Along with Garden Songs, the tour's other piece is Luck's Hard, the recently released documentary about the making of the band's first album Rome, and the personalities of each member interacting to create a sprawling double album.

While newer songs hold a more country feel to them, the Do Good Assassins' work on Rome retains Hawkins' harder indie edge, even with the slowdown in tempo – something he attributes to the constant influx of new sounds around him.

"When I was 15–16 I got pretty politicized, and it was The Clash and Stiff Little Fingers, Minor Threat – pretty influential to me for the DIY thing and personal politics, and ever since then I consider myself a sponge," he said. "I hear Elvis Costello talk about this, where your minds never really off – you're listening and going, 'What can I pilage from this?'"

Earlier work from the band also feels more like a lament for love lost sometimes, of heartbreak, but Garden Songs is a change from those themes Ron stated.

"The new records songs are a lot more and birth and mortality," Hawkins said. "A lot of the songs are about that – how do you grow old gracefully, productively?"

But also about beginnings with songs like "Saskia" written for a friend whose daughter was born prematurely three months, eventually surviving.

While most think a documentary about the making of the band's first album might seem daunting, Hawkins brushed off the possible stresses involved in the feat.

"[Recording wasn't] really stressful, [but] a classic move I would make, because I have a reputation as a shit disturber in the Canadian music industry – what would be ballsier and more 'fuck you' than starting a band and your first record being a double album and making a documentary about you band."

Spinal Tap anyone?

Call the Office is located at 216 York St., with tickets for The Do Good Assassins selling for $20. Garden Songs released February 3 on Pheromone Records.

A heart healthy Valentine's Day for singles and couples

KAREN NIXON-CARROLL
INTERROBANG

Let's face it, Valentine's is an occasion for the females. And for the approximately five per cent of the male population looking forward to it too. This can go both ways.

If you are single, don't sweat it or spend hours online looking for a mate. Turn the day into something positive: grab your single friends and spend the day doing happy, healthy things that fill you with positive endorphins. For instance, your day could look like this:

8 a.m.

Friends arrive for a heart healthy breakfast of oatmeal, berries, yogurt and egg whites.

9:30 to 11:15 a.m.

Get your cardio on at Super Circuit, followed by stress-relieving yoga – 10:30 to 11:15 a.m. – at Fitness 101, which is only $5.50 if you don't have a membership.

12:45 to 3 p.m.

After a hot shower, meet up now for lunch at the mall – try some heart healthy fare at Cultures – followed by a couple hours of power shopping and trying on fun outfits. You can burn as much as five to 800 calories in this time frame if you keep your body moving.

3:30 p.m.

Pick up your heart healthy smoothie and discreetly take it in to the movie theatre for the latest romantic comedy. You could also head to a salon or spa for some well-deserved manicure/pedicures or a massage. This is a good time to let your body rest, because you need that too.

5:30 p.m.

Take a 20-minute walk down to your favourite restaurant for your 6 p.m. reservations. Choose dishes such as baked or grilled chicken or fish – without creamy sauces – steamed veggies with whole grains. Opt for lighter calorie drinks or stick to water with a slice of lemon or a slice of strawberry.

8:30 p.m.

Regroup at someone's house for a games night: could be an hour or so of Wii Sports or Just Dance or just relax and play the Game of Life.

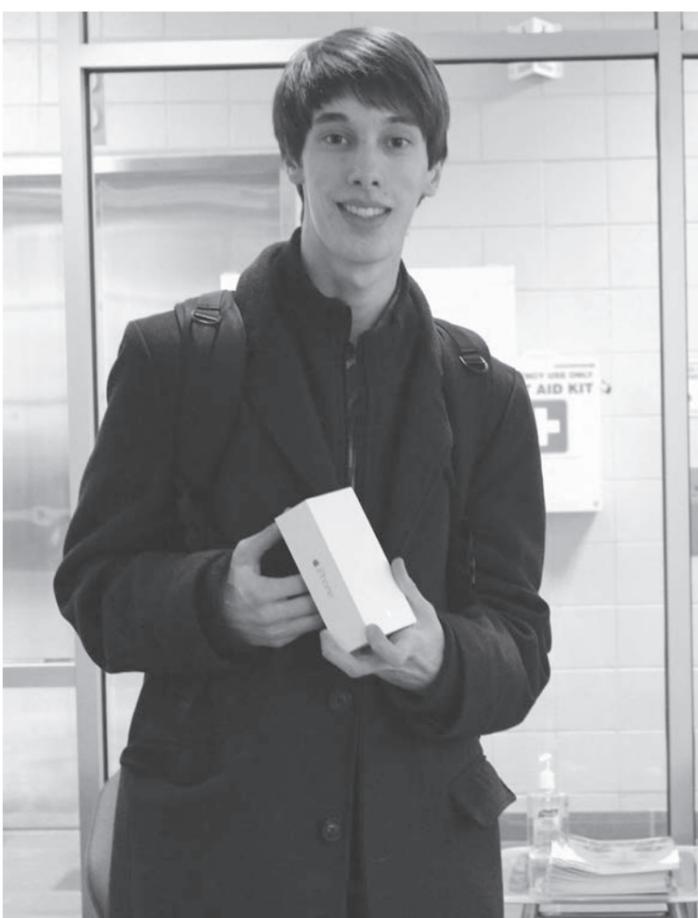

10:30 p.m.

If you still have some energy left, head out on the town for a couple hours of dancing.

For the couples, your day could look pretty much the same but with a few twists: Book an afternoon at the spa, where you can have lunch and get a couples' massage. Then you can either cozy up at the movies or go for an outdoor skate or ski together. The after-dinner fun is up to you: wink, wink.

Brick breakers and heart breakers

Games to help you end it this Valentine's

ESHAAN GUPTA
GAMING
THE SYSTEM

It's that time of the year when love is in the air. But let's face it: for some of us, love plain stinks. Maybe we need more alone time on a couch in a poncho armed with Doritos and every single season of Scrubs instead of yet another date so tense it makes a death row inmate's last supper seem like evening tea.

What better way to say, "I'm done with you," than through the medium of video games? Games that can assist you well in the ways of smooth breakups include:

Mario Party

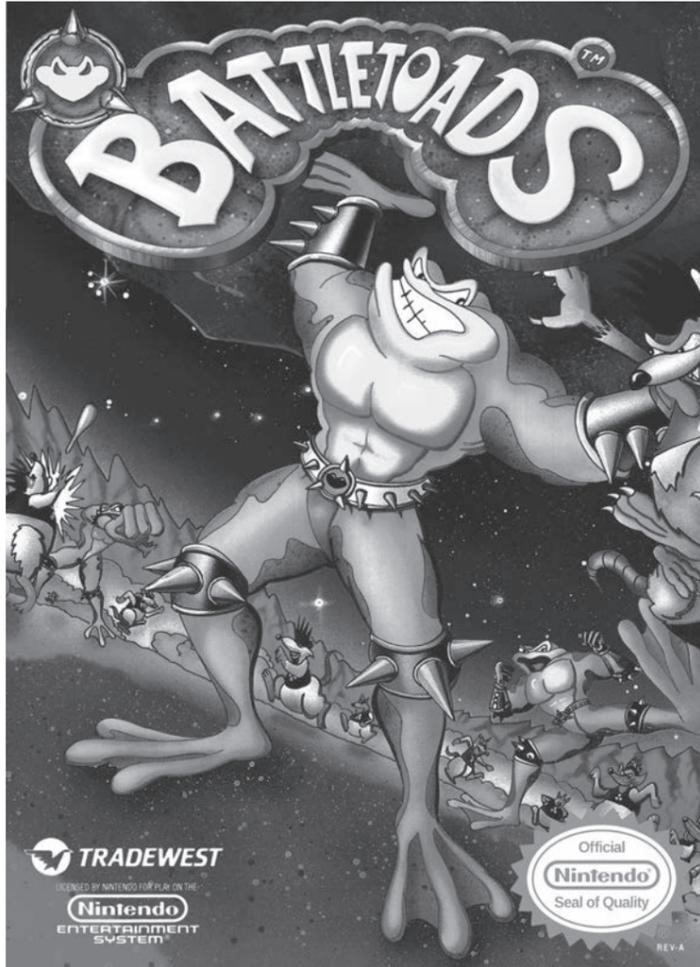

Do I even need to explain any further? It's the Monopoly of relationship breakers, the destroyer of many friendships into spiteful, mutual hatred. And under the sadistically evil guise of fun, multiplayer entertainment too.

Portal 2

Frustration is dealing with incompetence, and Portal 2's co-op mode with the two cute little robots is the perfect way to get people pulling hairs out of their heads through your own supposed incompetence. "SHOOT A PORTAL THERE! NO, THERE! LOOK, LOOK!" they'll scream, even using the game's "shoot here, dummy" target marker button, as you glide around the level in blissful idiocy, occasionally spawning portals under her robot linking to a far-off wall for a death fall.

Battletoads

Besides being the butt of a long-running internet prank meme, this Nintendo Entertainment System effort by a fledgling young Rare – before its big Nintendo buy-out – makes the aforementioned frustration-through-incompetence a relative cakewalk. Battletoads is a game where both players fail no matter who's at fault. Hitting that conspicuously placed rock during the infamous turbo tunnel section may send your character flying off the screen. But in the end, everyone suffers with a level restart. You'll be yelling, "ARE YOU SERIOUS? HAVE YOU EVER PLAYED A VIDEO GAME IN YOUR LIFE?" in no time.

Turning on friendly-fire damage would be too obvious in this co-op zombie shooter whose emphasis on player teamwork isn't just a marketing gimmick. Sometimes, they will need help getting that smoker tongue strangling them off their neck, which gives you the perfect time to simply scoot ahead yelling "I FOUND A KATANA, CHECK THIS OUT!" instead of – you know – actually saving them.

Any Lego co-op game

It's really as simple as constantly hitting your level partner until they blow up into a burst of collectible studs. Making them frustrated isn't a matter of blatant incompetence as it is a build-up of irritation as you constantly keep punching his or her characters as they, the brave Lego Luke Skywalker, try to brawl with Lego Stormtroopers.

What not to buy for Valentine's Day

JESSICA KLAVER

Valentine's Day is crawling up on us, and there are so many gifts that you can buy for your special someone. Here are some things you should avoid buying your significant other this year.

Bouquet of roses

This one falls at the top of the list, because it is cliché and predictable. Not only will you pay top dollar for roses on Valentine's Day, but your date will also be overwhelmed by your lack of creativity.

Assorted box of chocolates

These can be expensive and filled with terrible-tasting chocolate. You are paying for the pretty heart box that they come in. If you want to buy chocolates, buy higher end ones that are worth the price, like Laura Secord, Ferrero Rocher or Lindt.

Stuffed animals with cute messages

These stuffed animals were great when you were in high school but not so much when you're in college or university. When you're busy starting your career and becoming a professional, you don't want a stuffed bear with "I Wuv You" stitched to a heart sitting on your bed.

A bouquet of roses is the most cliché of them all. Try making your own arrangement or just get her something else.

Perfume or cologne

This is something that seems like a great gift to give, but in reality, it's not. It's almost impossible to know what is going to smell good on someone else. You also might not know what scents he or she like and will want to wear.

Ties

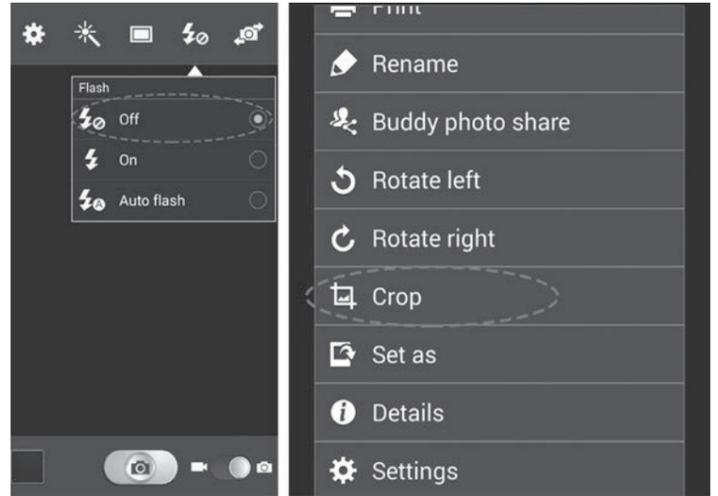

If I may speak for the men for a minute – they don't like clothes. Clothes are pretty much never a good gift idea for a man. But a tie is even worse. Most men don't even like wearing one; they only wear it out of necessity.

Fundies

The underwear built for two; these sound complicated and do not seem like it would accomplish the goal you are trying to achieve. Don't restrict your fun to the confines of a pair of underwear.

Avoid this list of cliché gifts and the possibility of ruining your special someone's day. Think of the money you'll save. Happy Valentine's Day.

A couple tips on taking the perfect selfie: turn off the flash, and crop – don't zoom.

Phonography: Selfie 101

INTERROBANG

With Valentine's Day around the corner, your Tinder profile might need a little sprucing up. By following these five tips on how to take a selfie with your smartphone, you will be able to capture the perfect selfie and maybe even the perfect date, too.

1. Keep your lens clean

We touch our phones all day every day, so it's no wonder they get dirty pretty quickly. The camera lens is no exception. A dirty lens can cause photos to look blurry, so make sure to keep it clean. Try using a microfibre cloth to clean your lens to prevent from scratching it.

2. Use your back-facing camera

Your front-facing camera might be convenient in the fact that it allows you to pose yourself before taking a picture, but don't let it fool you. Generally speaking, with smartphones, the front-facing camera usually has a lower resolution – meaning less pixel density and a lower quality of the image captured – than the back-facing camera. Although it may be more difficult, try taking pictures with your back-facing camera instead of the front. The difference in picture quality will blow you away. The more you practice taking pictures with the back-facing camera, the better you will get at it.

3. Crop, don't zoom

Since the lens on your digital camera is fixed and don't provide the ability to physically zoom your lens, they use interpolation to make the image bigger by adding pixels mainly by guessing. This can destroy details in the image and create a sort of fuzzy look to your appearance. By cropping, you can still save more detail in the image than you would with zoom.

4. Flash vs. ambient lighting

Since the flash on your cellphone is much smaller and less powerful than those on cameras, you run the risk of flash fallout – where the centre of the image is overexposed and the outer fringes become underexposed. This can cause you to look washed out. Try instead to use ambient or natural lighting. Doing so will leave you with a much healthier appearance and a natural feeling to the photo.

5. Edit

Editing your photos allows you the freedom to tweak your pictures to perfection. Photo not vibrant enough? A little dark? Throw it into a photo-editing app and fix it. Today, there are many different photo-editing apps that allow many different editing options. Using filters can also be a quick and simple way to adjust your photos, but be careful when using filters, because they can make your picture look tacky and fast.

If I had a time machine, I'd get my two hours back

PAM-MARIE GUZZO

Hidden in a secret compartment in a surprisingly clean basement lie the plans to a time machine, code named Project Almanac. Discovered by a group of smarter-than-average teenagers after they see something odd on an old video camera, the machine is constructed in the hopes of changing lives for the better.

However, teenagers being teenagers, things quickly go awry.

Starting with the little bit of positive this movie has, the acting is pretty good. Then again, any movie that brings up a consistent nervous tick once and then has the actor instantly forget about it can't be said to be great. There's also an issue with having an actor who clearly doesn't need glasses wear glasses. Johnny Weston – playing the main character David Raskin – creates a constant annoyance by never keeping his glasses on even when driving, which is probably illegal.

This is far from the most illegal thing that happens in the movie. On top of breaking into a school to steal the great amount of hydrogen it inexplicably has, they manage to buy tickets for – and subsequently win – the lottery even though the oldest is only 17. This is technically a spoiler, but it's also so obscenely cliché that it really doesn't count.

CREDIT: PARAMOUNT PICTURES

Something chalk full of clichés like Project Almanac could have audiences wanting to travel back in time to watch another movie.

Speaking of clichés, Project Almanac either mentions or does every time-travel cliché possible, while strangely avoiding mentioning the one movie that is most relevant – The Butterfly Effect. They mention almost every other time-travel movie – even including a quick screen shot of Bill and Ted – and then explain the theoretical concept of the butterfly effect without using the words or mentioning the movie even once. It's almost a ridiculous omission that makes no sense after the breaking of the movie universe wall, which is the thing where every movie exists in a world with no other movies.

There are also a ton of plot holes that make Project Almanac even more unrealistic than your average time-travel, teen-romantic, sci-fi, drama movie. The pseudo-scientific explanations are mostly just people saying the names of random chemicals, with no link to logic or actual science, mixed with mumbled half-explanations about batteries. The film also – somewhat comically – mentions Doctor Who and then breaks the one big rule the Doctor has instead of including it in their random collection of arbitrary rules. Considering the amount of time-travel movies and shows mentioned, one would think that paradox would be high on the list of things to avoid.

By somehow managing to be the most cliché time-travel movie ever created, as well as the most poorly-researched and executed one,

Project Almanac is a great disappointment. The movie relies heavily on jargon that the actors clearly don't understand, and only allows the men to present themselves as scientists and engineers, leaving the women to be nothing more than love interests and plot devices.

It's sad to see yet another movie that does nothing more than perpetuate stereotypes even when the opportunity to do and be more is so readily available.

RELATIONSHIPS: SHARING THE Love

PRESTON LOBZUN
INTERROBANG

Monogamous relationships are considered the norm. Two people romantically interested in each other looking to share a brighter future with are staple relationships we see in fiction and media. There are, however, people that break this norm and create their own consensual love triangle by not choosing a life of monogamy. Instead, non-monogamous relationships fall under the umbrella of polyamory; relationships that are inclusive of more than one intimate partner with the consent of everyone involved. They are relationships that are distinct from practices like swinging – emphasizing sex with others as only a recreational activity – and includes but not limited to polygamy, sub-relationships and open relationships.

The practice of being in a non-monogamous relationship requires a great amount of trust and dedication to partners as a Reddit user slice_of_pi explained, “Poly relationships are hard, far more so than traditional monogamous ones, because you have a cubed number of relationship issues every time you add someone – my girlfriend and I, for example, have the typical dating things between us, and then there’s her relationship with my wife, mine with her husband (we’re friends), and then her relationship with my wife.”

For those looking to dive into these relationships, it’s important to keep these things in mind and it’s also important to distinguish that polyamory is not only about the hook-ups. These bonds need to be passionate and communication has to be constant when a new partner enters or exits. It’s essential that people work out the ground rules and agreements from the beginning as secret infidelities are no more or less hurtful than they are to a monogamous couple.

“The single most essential thing is to talk, which is also what sinks most relationships incidentally, but with additional people it’s far, far more essential,” said slice_of_pi. “In my opinion, a lot of ‘poly’ relationships with younger people are more an excuse to have multiple casual lovers, and while there isn’t anything wrong with that, they aren’t deep, meaningful connections. Just because I have a different frame of reference, it doesn’t mean I’m not going to get hurt emotionally, if that makes sense.”

The different types of polyamory can get a little daunting to read but they do properly explain the various types of relationships that exist out there. Breaking the monotony of monogamy, here are the different forms of polyamory explained briefly.

Polygamy: The overarching term for marriage to more than one spouse. Illegal in most countries and mostly but not always focused on one man married to many wives (polygyny instead of polyandry).

Sub-Relationships: Multiple partners distinguished by primary, secondary or sometimes tertiary relationships. Different partners shift in focus based on the current standing of the person.

Polyfidelity: A group with multiple romantic interests in each other will restrict sexual contact to people only within the group. It is different than polygamy, which implies marriage although group marriage is considered to be a polyfidelity type relationship. Polyfidelity is also not considered to fall under the open relationship title because activity and intimacy is limited to only certain partners.

Mono/Poly Relationships: A relationship in which one partner is monogamous and is knowingly with a polyamorous partner.

Geometric Arrangements: A catchall term for any sort of triad or quad relationship. These relationships are defined by each person’s mutual interest and activity with each other.

Open relationships: Partners in open relationships permit sexual interactions with people outside of the relationship but may still be considered exclusive emotionally. Swinging is seen as being a part of open relationships however there is debate within these communities as to whether it is necessarily polyamorous due to the fact that it does not include forming romantic connections to people outside of the relationship.

Do these relationships work for everyone? Not necessarily. We’re all people with different values and plans in our lives. We actively search companionship because it is literally in our nature to do so. Our fellow great ape kin are not strangers to polyamory so where was it that we strayed off? slice_of_pi closed our discussion with an enthusiastic outlook for the future of polyamory in our societies:

“Poly relationships are definitely not going anywhere – the cable shows devoted to the topic are popular enough that it’s apparent public tolerance for the subject is changing. Personally, I see no justification for not treating marriage like corporations in property law, because when you get right down to it, that’s basically what they are.”

Who gets the pet when two grownups lose heart?

ALLY JOL | INTERROBANG

So things didn’t work out for you and your partner and you’ve decided to call it quits, but isn’t there someone else that you’re forgetting? You know, that little fur ball that is just as much part of the relationship as the two of you; the one who thinks you’re mom or dad?

Angie Aristone, psychic/medium and animal communicator here in London believes that it is very important for people to take their pets into consideration when ending a relationship.

“Pets – especially dogs – reflect our issues and energy back to us and they feel our stress, so a stressful split would certainly affect most dogs negatively,” Aristone said. “They are also very much sentient beings that deserve to be considered in any family changes.”

How should a couple handle a breakup where a family pet is involved?

“Consider who it is the dog [or other pet] is bonded to most with as much priority as the logistics. Moving the animal from house to house is less ideal than having their former owner happily come visit them at their new location,” Aristone said. “However, I know of cases where the dog and the child go from mom’s to dad’s each week and the dog does too. Since the dog and the child are always in it together they are both perfectly content with the arrangement, but mom and dad are also in an amicable relationship, which makes a massive difference.”

Maybe those who had their parents divorce when they were younger can understand the feeling. What is going on? Why is this happening? Is it my fault? How come I don’t get a say in this? Surprisingly a pet is no different and can also feel this way.

“They struggle most when we pity them because they don’t understand the problem and they feel like something is wrong with them but can’t tell what it is. It affects their confidence and well-being,” Aristone said. “They will look for people who seem to be missing but they tend to understand the circumstances since they were around for the split and the move. They remember but they don’t dwell.”

This being said, it is important for the welfare of your pet to be immersed with positivity to help them move forward with this new information, like you would do for a child who is experiencing a separation. As a parent, you would not break down in front of a child about your divorce because – although you may be looking for comfort – he/she does not understand.

“If they live with you through an emotional time then they need a break from the emotional climate in the house too,” Aristone said.

“I have to say that there are far too many dogs sitting in the place where a therapist should be. Too often we as humans dump our emotional baggage on our pets,” Aristone said. “We all communicate with our animals through thoughts/pictures in our minds and with our feelings. Whether you’re aware of it or not, this is the way you really talk to your animal all the time so it’s important to be mindful of what you’re sharing.”

They’ve joked about it in movies and on TV, people get their pet to choose which owner they like more, but can a pet actually choose who they want to live with?

“Of course they can!” Aristone said. “In some cases it really is a no brainer but in other cases there has to be a discussion, but just because we all love the dog doesn’t mean the dog should get carted around from house to house for the rest of his/her life. They usually have declared an affinity for one person already. That’s usually who they should go with unless that bond isn’t healthy. They adapt best in environments with happy people who can spend time really regarding them. Look them in the eye. Pet them. Smile. Feel how much you love them while you pet them and they will know everything is going to be okay.”

A family pet is someone who deserves respect like any other family member. Considering them when going through a break up shows that you are a good owner and love your pet just as much as they truly love you.

“We can learn about love just by watching a dog play with their human. No words will teach the lesson...just watch and learn,” Aristone said.

HOOK, LINE AND SINKER:

Casual relationships

Through sheepish smirks, we mumble one-word answers about our lives at college to our parents. Are you eating healthy? Yes. Are you getting good grades? Yes. Are you dating anyone? Maybe we don't answer, lie or change the subject, but we usually try to stray from the truth: college is slutty.

There's a reason why we're willing to tell our parents if we have a significant other, but not about our hook up last weekend. It's not what they did.

"In the past, people used to marry for all kinds of reasons: money, power, stability. Love and marriage weren't necessarily connected," said Lynda Martens, a local marriage and family therapist.

"Because we don't need marriage in order to have [those things], we place less importance on it."

This is something new to our generation. We believe that we can do anything on our own. We really can have all of the things our parents' generation deemed important without having a partner – big house, fancy car, vacations and sex.

Paired with our confident attitude, some biological factors come into play when considering the prominence of what's been coined hook-up culture. That is, a group of people that accepts casual sex focusing on physical pleasure without the commitment of a long-term or monogamous relationship.

"Puberty used to happen later, so we didn't have this big window between when people were sexually mature and when they married. Now we do. People are young and physically mature, and not marrying until they're in their 30's. There's this huge group who are looking for a partner, exploring sexuality, and wanting to learn about themselves," Martens said.

"As women become more independent and have more rights, we understand that we are powerful and really want to find that partner that can satisfy every need we think we deserve. It's taking us a lot longer to figure out what that is. We need to explore our options," said Allison Forbes, a recent Western University graduate and self-admitted active participant in hook-up culture.

With the help of various technological initiatives, exploring our options is easy. Websites like Plenty of Fish, OKCupid and mobile apps like Tinder are making finding a partner more accessible.

"It's also just more socially acceptable. It used to be frowned upon. There was a huge social stigma [attached to it], but it's the norm now," Martens said.

But not only is it the norm, it's expected of you if you want the quintessential college experience.

"There is a stigma against guys who don't hook up. I feel like it's expected of me to try and prove myself based on the amount of 'kills' I have," said Joseph Timmins, a Fanshawe student.

"There's so much sexual information around us that we are constantly viewing sex, seeing sex, talking about sex. You don't have the social pressure of feeling like you did something wrong," Forbes added. "So number one, it's so easy to get, and number two, no one's going to judge you. They're proud of you, even for females now."

As with any relationship structure, rules and courtesies begin to form.

"[The rules] depend on what kind of hook up it is," Forbes said.

"If it's with someone who you knew prior to the hook up, there might be some expectation of further communication. Whereas if you go to the bar and bring someone home, there's probably no expectation except for them to leave your apartment."

"I know what I'm going in there for and that's usually the case for the other person, too. So as long as we go through an unspoken agreement that we're just in it for a hook up, I'm always cool with leaving it at just that," said Timmins of the encounters.

Though according to the American Psychological Association, between 60 to 80 per cent of college students engage in casual sex, it seems to be the consensus that they do strive for a long-term relationship eventually.

"Ultimately, we all desire to feel loved and connected to people. Hooking up doesn't give us that. It gives the illusion of that. It meets the need of exposing us to a wide variety of people, but ultimately what we want is intimacy and connection," Martens said.

"Dating usually does start with hooking up," Forbes said. "It's with someone you hook up with regularly, and then you create barriers and rules and a relationship forms."

She has had a serious relationship before and wants to have another someday. "My end goal is to be with someone. I want to share my life with someone completely, long-term."

"Long-term relationships are satisfying in a totally different way than hook ups. Being able to come home from work and to catch up on your partner's day, having someone you look forward to seeing, and somebody that you can always count on to support you, is huge. I think it's a really important part of anyone's life," Timmins agreed.

There is no doubt that millennials embrace the idea of self-exploration. We're encouraged to be independent and gather as many experiences as we can before we settle down to, in the words of our parents, start our lives. So whether it's exploring new countries, food or our sexuality, we've decided to squeeze every last bit out of our youth.

"I don't think it's a problem, I think it's a learning experience," Forbes concluded.

Stars that went out with a whimper (part one) good-looking Spilsbury never acted in more than a few minor roles in daytime soaps before being offered to take on the legendary TV do-gooder, the Lone Ranger, a part that would surely thrust him into stardom. Of course, the film itself turned out to be a train wreck bigger than any steam engine destroyed in an old western. It was largely because of the negative buzz created from the Universal Pictures' poor treatment of the original Lone Ranger, Clayton Moore, suing him for making public appearances with the trademark Lone Ranger mask. The fact that Spilsbury couldn't act to save his life, having received the parts solely based on his chiseled looks, didn't help matters either. Unsurprisingly, The Legend of the Lone Ranger remains Spilsbury's first and last Hollywood feature.

Galentine's Day: For all the single ladies have to spend your Valentine's Day alone, drinking wine and cruising Tinder. Instead, you should some time to appreciate all the other wonderful people in your life, such as friends and family – even your dog.

Here are some fun activities to do sans significant other and how to look fashionable doing them.

Retail therapy

What's one of the many wonderful things about being single on Valentine's Day? You don't have to drop a ton of cash on your SO, which means you have more money to purchase the things that you like. Although a new study by Erasmus University has suggested that retail therapy actually makes you feel worse, we all know that is a blasphemous lie. At the risk of sounding materialistic, no man has ever made me as happy as my studded peep toe pumps from Torrid. It's important to remember that retail therapy should not equal going into debt. Stick to one or two purchases, maybe a dress that flaunts your curves or a new pair of jeans that fit you just right. The idea is to make purchases that make you feel great about yourself.

Dress code: If you're a marathon shopper, it's important to wear clothing that's comfortable and easy to get in and out of. A comfy sweater dress or a jersey dress is perfect for the occasion. Pair with tights and boots – any style – and you've got a look that's comfortably chic.

Girls night out

You don't need a significant other to enjoy a night out. Grab a group of friends and hit the town. If you're planning to go out for dinner, plan ahead and make a reservation. Chances are, Richmond's finest establishments will be flooded with couples on romantic dinner dates. After dinner, hit up your favourite club for a night of dancing with your girls.

Dress code: Some bars implement an annoying red or pink dress code for occasions like this. Before you go out, you'll need to decide if you're going to participate or find a bar that isn't Valentine's Day on steroids. As pub hopping is quite popular, your safest bet is to wear a cute little black dress and accessorize with pink or red. You won't look like a walking Valentine, but you won't have any dress code issues either. Most importantly, wear comfy shoes. Don't be that girl who wants to walk around barefoot in -20 degree weather; you're married to your shoes for the night.

Girls night in

While spending a night out on the town with your girls is all fine and dandy, sometimes nothing can make you happier than spending the night in with a stack of movies, Chinese take-out and a bottle of wine. Throw in a game of Cards Against Humanity, and you've got a great night on your hands.

Dress code: Spending the night in calls for comfy clothes, but that doesn't mean you can't be fashionably comfy. Combine jeans or leggings with a comfy oversized sweater or a cardi shawl and T-shirt, and you're golden.

Whatever you do this Valentine's Day, the most important thing to remember is that it's just another day of the year.

Matthew Modine

Matthew Modine wasn't exactly a household name, but his up-and-coming status was definite. Hot on his heels after portraying Private "Joker" Davis in Stanley Kubrick's Full Metal Jacket, Modine was ready for his next big feature after several well-received dramatic features, which turned out to be the infamous 1995 box office bomb, Cutthroat Island. The movie bankrupted Carloco Pictures and made pirate swashbucklers an untouchable film genre until nearly eight years later with Pirates of the Caribbean.

Klinton Spilsbury

Here's a strange case of starlight being snuffed out before it even had the chance to shine. There's a reason why this name is unfamiliar to you. Remember The Lone Ranger? No, not the $225-million box office disaster starring Johnny Depp. The other, $18-million box office disaster, The Legend of the Lone Ranger starring young, unknown Klinton Spilsbury. Getting comfy for Valentine's Day

HAI HA NGUYEN
THE SHOPPING BAG
hhnguyen.77@gmail.com

Valentine's Day is that dreaded day of the year when everyone takes sides whether they love it or hate it. It can be downright awkward for singles and people in relationships.

If you're single, you probably hate the holiday or ignore it and just go on with your life as if it was any other day. If you're in a relationship, there could be the expectation that something special will be planned with your significant other. If the day falls short of your expectations, that can be an awkward situation.

Then there's the debate of what to wear to places if you have plans or don't have plans. The best solution to the stress of Valentine's Day is to stay in, snuggle up with something comfy and eat some pizza.

Comfortable fashion is always key, whether it's Valentine's Day or not, feeling like you're walking on a cloud around your own place beats having to dress up to go somewhere.

A mumu, onesie, bathrobe or a Snuggie with some soft fluffy slippers are some key essentials. Here's a quick run-down of what they are according to Urban Dictionary.

Mumu

A dress people wear when they want to eat a lot of food.

Onesie

The onesie is a one-piece suit, usually something you wear for lazy days at home. It is also used for one-piece snowsuits and one-piece motorcycle suits. The word is sometimes spelled onesy. The most comfortable thing one can wear, there is no denying it.

We all know what a bathrobe is so let's skip it.

Snuggie

A blanket with sleeves. Who would have thought of such a thing? Really though, it's just a robe worn backwards, you're not actually wearing a Snuggie. You can wear these to sporting events, grocery stores, out at campfires and wherever else you can be made fun of at.

The fuzzy mumu in the photo would be appealing to people who love cats and would rather spend time with their pets than to pursue any romantic interests. Since it hides everything, the onesie and mumu are the perfect pieces to wear while eating pizza. You can go right ahead and finish the whole thing while binge watching seasons of Friends on Netflix.

The bathrobe would also work if you are going for the ultimate too-lazy-and-comfy-to-care-how-I-look look.

If your sweetheart is laid back and would rather stay in and be comfy with you, the Snuggie allows you to share the comfort while breaking the restrictions of having your hand stuck underneath the blankets. The sleeves in the blankets allow you to snuggle while being able to skip to the next episode of the show you're watching, romantically feed pizza to your honey and eat the pizza yourself while your body remains warm underneath the blankets. It's a timeless piece that you will be able to use over and over, regardless of what holiday it is.

Whether you are in a relationship with a person or in a relationship with pizza and desserts for Valentine's Day, there's no denying that comfort is key for this special day. Lace, leather and satin shall soon be replaced with fleece, fluffy polyester and plushy blankets.

What is there not to love about treating yourself to a nice comfy night?

Don't say you weren't warned. Games like New Super Mario Bros. can - and will - ruin perfectly good relationships.

The ultimate un-kissable lip games to play with your SO

JOSHUA R. WALLER BEAUTY BOY

When we think of Valentine's Day and beauty looks, we often picture red or soft pink lips with a classic eye makeup. Lip stains are usually worn to retain colour through a romantic, candle lit dinner and the mushy whatever else that follows.

But this Valentine's trend is so overdone and needs to be changed.

This year, play hard-to-get and wear the boldest, creamiest lip colour you can get your hands on.

The best thing about wearing an intensely bold lip is that you don't have to focus so much on the rest of your makeup, because your lips become your statement.

With a bold lip, keep the eye makeup soft and defined and keep your blush light. If you have too much going on it will ruin the look; you want to be hard to get but don't scare your lover away.

A beautiful colour to wear this Valentine's Day is Liv by NARS. It's a dark and deep purple that is a part of the Audacious lipstick line. These lipsticks have an intense amount of pigment and also contain a white mushroom extract that helps nourish and exfoliate the lips while you wear it. Since dark colours can be tricky to apply, I always recommend starting off with a dark lip liner to get the shape of your lips perfectly. Then fill in the rest of your lips with the liner to act as a base, which will help hold the colour longer and prevent it from bleeding.

To help make your lips pop even more, take a light-coloured concealer and outline the shape of your lip. Once applied, feather the edges out so it blends seamlessly into your skin. This will accentuate your lip colour and shape as well as keep the lip line crisp.

If you want to be dramatic and un-kissable this Valentines, wear a black lip. Black lipstick is always associated with a gothic style, but it can easily be worn as a fierce, statement lip. The best way to begin is to apply a really hydrating lip balm, because the next step is to apply a black, kohl eyeliner to the entire lip. Yes, eyeliner. This will prevent bleeding and will also mask the colour of your lips, because the worse thing to see when wearing a black lipstick is to see pinkish red show through.

Lastly, you will apply your black lipstick and I recommend doing this with a lip brush just to be sure you don't get the lipstick on your face. My favourite black lipstick is called Pristine by Illamasqua, but unfortunately you can no longer buy it in North America. The next best thing is Makeup Forever's 50 Satin Black.

This Valentine's Day, go against the typical and redundant trends and do something different. Be fierce, be bold and be un-kissable.

ANDREW VIDLER

With the rise of video games in popularity among mainstream audiences, the idea of sitting down with your significant other and a video game for an evening in is not a foreign concept. Especially with the female demographic becoming more dominant in the gaming community.

With Valentine's Day approaching, more than a few couples will be cuddling up with some games amid the lousy weather, and there are a couple of games that are absolutely perfect for romance and love to blossom.

But that would make a lousy list. So, instead, here is a few games you should absolutely not play with someone you care about if you plan on getting through an evening in peace.

New Super Mario Bros. (Wii/Wii U)

Just to get it out of the way, there is going to be a huge Nintendo bias on this list since they make the best games to play with others. That's just a fact.

When Nintendo reinvented the series that made games what they are today, it decided there was one thing missing from their precise, timing-based platformer: co-op. What could be a better idea than taking a game that requires split second, perfect timing at higher levels and putting the responsibility of perfection on two people in order to finish?

Honestly, co-op Super Mario is pretty damn fun. That is, until you and your SO move to make a jump and your partner uses your head as a spring, knocking you to your bottomless death. Or when you're waiting for that perfect moment to move through fire and having them nudge you in the back ever so slightly, just enough for that fireball to singe Mario's mustache off his nose.

Completing a tough stage is an achievement worthy of kisses and high-fives all around, providing that your relationship can survive that long.

Mario Party

The ultimate in a test of friendship, one of the cruelest games known to man and a bastardization of skill and luck that can drive the closest couple to be at each other's throats with the wrong roll of a dice.

The idea is simple: you're on a game board, you spin a number and you move, with the final objective being to have the most stars and coins come the end of the game. Each turn is punctuated with a mini-game of which there are a dizzying variety, and victory is rewarded with more coins and progression to the final goal.

It all seems pretty straightforward until they threw in the obnoxious chance spaces, offering players a chance to steal hard earned coins and stars from the one you claim to love. Nothing is a bigger punch in the gut than being ahead with one turn to go and having your date randomly land on that space and steal it all, rising from last to first and leaving you in a deep shame.

Arguments will be had, tears will be shed, and one of you will say something you can't take back.

Seriously, if you love them, don't play Mario Party.

Interrobang music experts present: SONGS TO BREAK UP TO

Bobby Foley | Interrobang

I write about random things a lot. I write a lot about random things. But nothing is more seemingly random than love - the way it strikes, the way it grows and the way it stings - and consequently, this time of year can be a cruelly painful one for a lot of people.

Even if you're in a healthy relationship, you may have had your fill of the Valentine's Day hype machine. If you're not, this stupid weekend still presents you with obligation and social awkwardness that you didn't ask for and being surrounded by people celebrating fickle emotions certainly doesn't make anyone feel any better.

So for our anti-Valentine's Day issue, I've compiled this playlist as my gift to you - The Five Stages of a Breakup in 10 Songs, available to stream for free online via Rdio (bit.ly/fivestages-rdio) and Spotify (bit.ly/fivestages-spotify). You don't need to be freshly released in order to listen, but if you are, it helps.

First, a little clarity - there isn't a specific standard when it comes to the process of grieving a relationship, although most sources reference the widely-accepted five stages of grief: denial, anger, bargaining, depression and acceptance. Psychologically, this makes sense: the collapse of a romantic relationship to mourning a close friend, something to which almost anyone who has experienced heartbreak can attest.

But for better or worse, I can only cover the issue from a male perspective. In an effort to gain some insight into the female perspective, I found alternate takes on the traditional five stages - like denial, rebounding/recklessness, swearing off men, nostalgia and moving on - that are a bit inconsistent with many males' process.

At the end of the day, I chose these songs because of the power of their message and their ability to provide an emotional upswing. No sweeping ballads, no sentimental undercurrent, just 32 minutes of music that doesn't pull any punches. Whether you're waiting for a pizza to arrive or jumping into the car to go and meet your friends, this mix is designed to energize and empower you to make the most out of this Valentine's Day on your own terms.

"Guilt Trip" - PUP

Boldly saying everything you want to say in the heat of the moment - "How many times have I lied to you? / If I was drunk when I said it, it might have been true." It's not me, it's you.

"Song for the Dumped" - Ben Folds Five

Ben Folds' candor and tenacity has made this a fan favourite since its release in the 1990's. Sometimes, the way that the relationship ends is just as bad as the romance itself. Sometimes it's worse, adding to insult with the sting of surprise. Go ahead, be angry about it.

"Cry Me A River" - Julie London

Many people would cite Ella Fitzgerald is the definitive jazz chanteuse, but Julie London recorded this would-be hit first. Her delivery is venomous as she taunts her former lover to long for her return, a bitter-sweet revenge we could all be so lucky to feel.

"Every Day Is A Struggle" - Senses Fail

Maybe the relationship needed to end. You're probably not the only one hurting about it.

"I Just Don't Know What To Do With Myself" - The White Stripes

The roller coaster epitomized. Don't mistake boredom for loneliness - you just need a distraction and maybe a friend to hold on to your cell phone if you're drinking.

"Patricia the Stripper" - Chris de Burgh

From an album of stories released 40 years ago, de Burgh's bouncy song about a stripper in the 1920's serves as a reminder not to take things too seriously in your breakup. And that no matter what the distraction, you shouldn't have to apologize for a little harmless fun.

"Cigarettes and Chocolate Milk (Reprise)" - Rufus Wainwright

Depression manifests itself in a lot of ways, and you're going to be tempted. Remember that food or drink is better than hooking up with your ex. It may be hard to convince you on bad days.

"Get Over It" - OK Go

How do you define happiness, anyway? We've all got problems, just make sure you aren't bringing them on yourself by being honest about what you're going through. Everything is temporary.

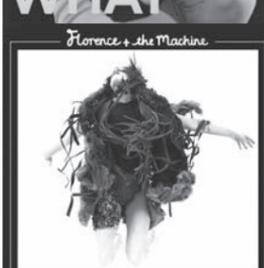

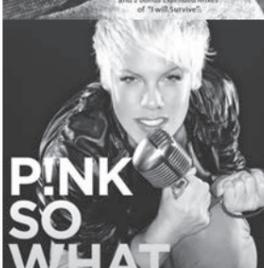

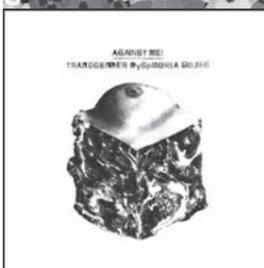

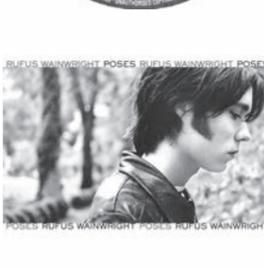

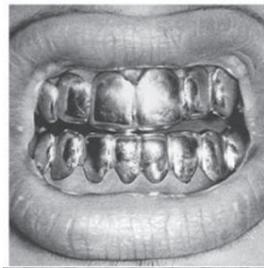

"Black Me Out" - Against Me!

If there is any album that hammers home the message of being true to oneself, I haven't heard it. If Laura Jane Grace can stand up for herself against the world we can all find the strength to make it through a weekend.

"I'm Gonna Find Another You" - John Mayer

There are a few satisfying barbs hidden in this gem, the Otis Redding-inspired closer of John Mayer's 2006 opus. "If I'm forced to find another, I hope she looks like you / yeah, and she's nicer too," he sings. Delicious.

Nick Reyno | Interrobang

Breakups kind of feel like getting gut-punched by Chuck Norris. Then when you think you've recovered - bam! Chuck Norris hits you again. If only Jackie Chan and Bruce Lee would kick him back to the school of bad acting and mullets. You can do so with an easy three-step program.

Step one: be thankful you don't have Chuck's awful hair.

Step two: Realize you're already a step ahead of the baddest badass in the galaxy.

Step three: Fending off Chuck Norris breakup syndrome is listening to breakup songs that will have you kicking those feelings to the curb.

"You're No Good" - Linda Ronstadt

We've had our ups and downs, and sometimes we've been the no-goodnik, but they just weren't healthy for us. This song is a classic, with a simple anthem that's easy to sing along too. No intricate lyrics - just a powerful message. Even if we've been the breaker in the past, it doesn't mean we deserved what happened.

"Fuck You" - CeeLo Green

Throw on this song and yell it out while throwing darts at a printout of your ex's face on a dartboard. "Fuck You" is witty and still an emotional song. CeeLo Green has given this song a bright retro vibe that brings great optimism and groove to an otherwise emotional song. "Fuck You" will help you vent but won't leave you pent up with rage, because it will also make you laugh.

"Somebody That I Used To Know" - Gotye

Sometimes we need to be sad. It's part of the process of getting over your ex. If we don't go through the motions then it's harder to move forward. Gotye focuses on the drifting that happens when two people split up, and he offers viewpoints from both sides of the relationship, which is uncommon for breakup songs. Perhaps this song will help us realize that there are factors on both sides that have caused things to fall apart. Let's accept that we each have flaws and start to focus on ourselves as individuals.

"Recovery" - Frank Turner

Not everyone's coping methods are going to be the best in the books, and not everyone's going to bounce back immediately, but that doesn't mean we should give up. This song acknowledges that it's a long journey out of the gloom we're in, but manages to keep an upbeat outlook through the somber lyrics. Sometimes we need to be sad before we can be happy, but hopefully this song will cast the process in a brighter light.

"I Will Survive" - Gloria Gaynor

This disco classic has been reinvented a dozen times, but going back and jamming out to the original will let you escape to the groovy era of roller dancing and magnificent hairdos. This song is inherently happy by nature of the music itself, but it also brings an important motto for us. This isn't the end. Things will go on. You've already fought through two decades of your life, and you're going to fight through many more.

"So What" - Pink

"So What" is here to remind you that your intrinsic value isn't based on anyone else. No one controls your happiness but you. This song is about getting out there and showing the world that you're still a rock star. It's about living how you want to live and saying "so what" to other people's expectations. If the lyrics in this song aren't enough to get you going, then the pounding drums and strutting electric guitars should do the trick bring some optimism.

"Dog Days Are Over" - Florence + The Machine

This song may not pertain to a relationship, but it covers battling with irrational feelings and leaves room for interpretation throughout. The chorus of "Dog Days Are Over" is as powerful as her voice and talks about letting go of the past and running full tilt into the future. You can't change what's happened, so why let it change you?

"Roar" - Katy Perry

It's been the ultimate feel-good self-empowering anthem of the last two. If your ex has ever pushed you down or stepped on you, then Katy Perry knows exactly where you're coming from. It's time to stop denying this guilty pleasure and sing it out louder - louder than a lion.

"Never Ever Getting Back Together" - Taylor Swift

Sometimes breakups are messy. They're foggy, and we have those on-again-off-again relationships. If it didn't work the first time, it's not going to work the second time, and Taylor is the poster child for this valuable life lesson. Be firm when things end. Don't compromise your values and don't fall back into the same slump you just got out of. The grieving process is infinitely better than taking a second roller coaster ride with someone who didn't work out the first time.

"Go Your Own Way" - Fleetwood Mac

This song was actually recorded while four of the five band mates were splitting up - with each other. "Go Your Own Way" conveys some competing viewpoints throughout the verses and lyrics. This song is about letting go of the person and caring for their well-being and not just how they can better your life. The chorus serves as a two-way anthem for you and your ex. Each of you must go on your own way and continue to develop into a unique individual.

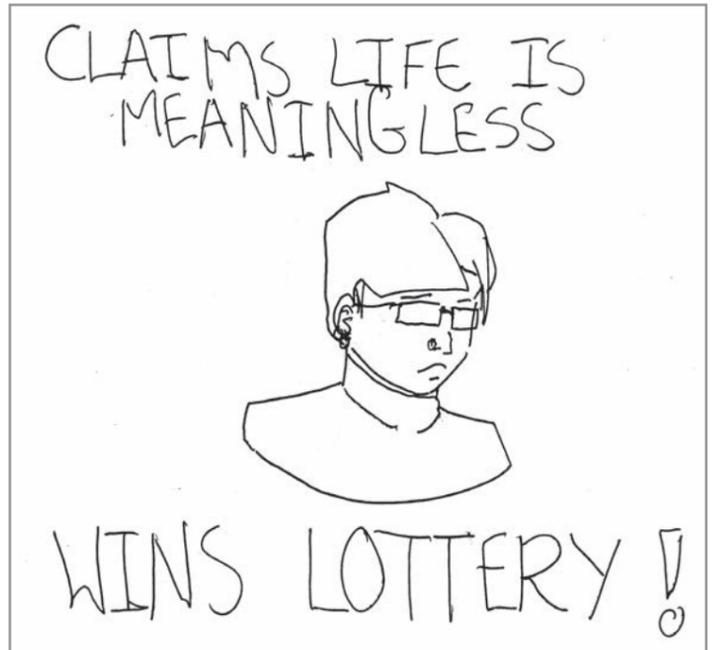

Go get a cheap box of chocolate, call up your best friend and take a road trip somewhere you've never been.

Sagittarius feels a sea of change. The rising tide lifts your vessel out of the mud. Not only do you know where to go, you now have the means to get there. Pay your respects to the Cancer Moon as you set sail.

Capricorn (Dec. 22 - Jan. 19)

You'll pay any price to get the straight story. If you're making this sacrifice for others, be sure they want it. You might lose ground, but you won't lose track. Everyone ends up where he or she belongs.

Aquarius (Jan. 20 - Feb. 18)

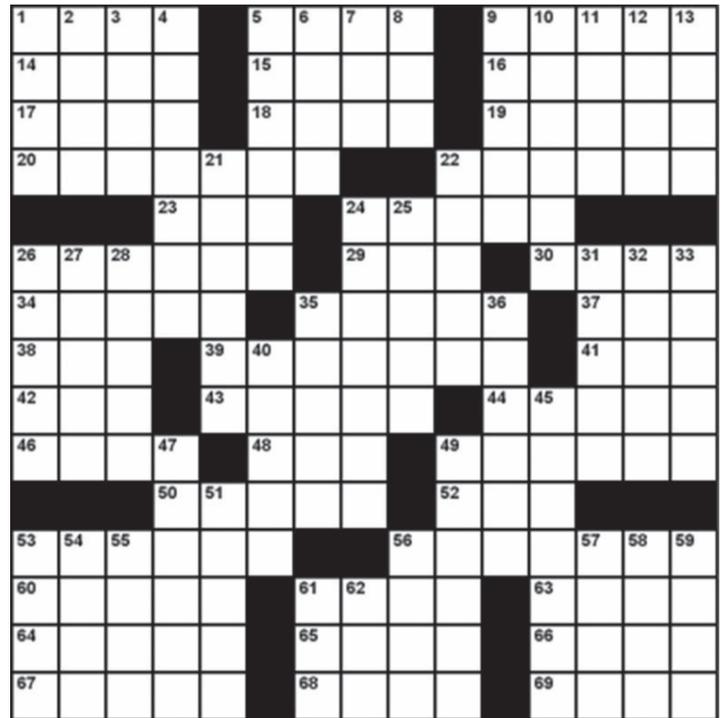

Your feelings still come from a deep place, but now you're happy to own them. Having developed a healthy respect for the ground, you're ready to attempt another flight. It's wonderful to laugh again.

It was time: January transfer round-up

ANDREW VIDLER
PREMIER LEAGUE
PONDERINGS
@OffHouseVidler

Another winter transfer period has come and gone in the Premier League, and it may have been one of the most boring January windows in recent memory.

This is the period of time that saw the arrivals of Luis Suarez at Anfield three years ago, on the back on the infamous transfer of Fernando Torres to Chelsea. Since then, supporters have come to expect that some big, surprising moves are on the cards for the winter period, and they have often been rewarded.

Conversely, this season's window had been full of the Premier League's managers claiming that they will not be making moves during the winter, as there is no need to "panic buy" this year.

Hearing that would be a surprise to nobody, as that is the rhetoric that most managers use every year, essentially becoming a media cliché, repeated until their team eventually does make a move and brings in a player.

This year, however, when the words left the mouths of managers such as Liverpool's Brendan Rodgers, they were in fact being straight with the media, as neither of the big teams in red brought in any new personnel over the winter.

The two biggest moves – perhaps unsurprisingly – were from the two richest clubs at the top of the table. Each club brought in a player that is likely to become involved in the first team right away.

Starting at the top, Chelsea made several moves during the last month, primarily in the outgoing category, as two players headed for the exit door at Stamford Bridge – André Schürrle and Mohamed Salah.

Mohamed Salah is now sent on loan to Fiorentina after failing to impress playing for Chelsea.

Schürrle – a World Cup winning attacker – returned to his native Germany to ply his trade with VfL Wolfsburg after failing to become a regular fixture of the Chelsea team.

Salah – a speedy Egyptian international – failed to make any impression at the club and has been sent on loan to Fiorentina, as part of the deal that has seen highly rated Colombian winger Juan Cuadrado arrive in England.

They join assist leader from the last summer's World Cup, Cuadrado, comes to England with a healthy return of 20 goals in 85 league appearances in Italy. He's also got a reputation for a fierce cross into the box that should aid the club in their push for the title.

Lurking just under Chelsea,

Manchester City was quieter in the window but managed a significant coup in the signing of Swansea City's Ivorian international Wilfried Bony. Some readers will recognize him as one of my "ones to watch" when he first arrived on the scene.

Pillaging nine goals in the first half of the season – and a healthy 16 last year – the young man earned a spot on the richest club in the country, whose owners have pegged him as the man to help them catch Chelsea in the title race.

There were some other notable transfers into England last month. One is Eljero Elia to high flying Southampton, a Dutch international whose natural skill has been overshadowed by his controversial antics on social media while playing in Germany and Italy over the last two seasons.

Both SUVs offer similar features, and pricing is about the same. But which one would come up on top in a battle?

Motoring: Battle of the big SUVs

NAUMAN FAROOQ
INTERROBANG

The population of the world is growing, and cities are getting more crowded. The best way to get around is perhaps to have something small and nimble.

However, everyone has different needs. If you live out of the mega city, you could justify having a large vehicle. Vehicles such as the 2015 Lincoln Navigator and the 2015 Infiniti QX80 are among the biggest luxury SUVs you can buy currently, but which is best?

It's good to point out that while both these vehicles are new, they are not what you'd call all-new.

The 2015 Infiniti QX80 is pretty much the same as the QX56 you could buy in 2014. With the name change, however, some new technology features have been added – along with minor styling tweaks – but the drivetrain remains the same. Open the hood and you'll still find a 5.6l V8 motor that pumps out 400 hp and 413 lb-ft of torque. Power is sent to all wheels through a seven speed automatic gearbox.

The 2015 Lincoln Navigator sits on roughly the same platform as the outgoing model, and while the new model looks similar to the old one, the nose and tail section have been heavily restyled – for the better. Most of the interior hasn't changed much. The dashboard saw some changes, but the biggest change is under the hood. Gone is the old, thirsty V8 motor, in with a smaller, lighter, yet more potent motor. For 2015, the Navigator gets a 3.5 l V6, that features two turbochargers. This motor produces 380 hp, and 460 lb-ft of torque. So, while it is a bit down on power compared to the Infiniti, it has a lot more torque. While the Navigator also has all-wheel drive, you only get a six-speed automatic gearbox.

However, the gear ratio in top gear is what matters most, and the more relaxed gear in the Lincoln meant it consumed less fuel. While I averaged 14.9 l/100 km in the Navigator, the QX80 drank 15.6 l/100 km. It's too close a figure to base your buying decision on, so let's look at other parameters.

You aren't going to buy either vehicle to win drag races, but performance is still important. Both vehicles have similar get up and go, but the Navigator – thanks to its twin turbos – seemed to pull away more effortlessly. The QX80, thanks to its big V8, did sound better under acceleration, so if you prefer mechanical sounds, you'll like this one better.

The ride quality of both vehicles is really good, as they are both designed to cover long distances with ease. By the smallest of margins, the Navigator rides a bit better and is quieter at highway speeds. The preferred heavier steering feel of the Navigator was more reassuring at highway speeds.

As for handling, the QX80 is a bit more tossable; its all-wheel drive system is more biased towards the rear wheels. That resulted in a bit of a moment out on the highway. Driving to Mississauga from London early on a Monday morning, I hit a large section of black ice. This caused the rear end of the vehicle to step out. Through corrective steering and the vehicles active all-wheel drive systems help, along with its electronic stability control (ESP) system. All was under control quite quickly, but it was not the kind of experience anyone would like to repeat. The vehicle was wearing proper winter tires, but it goes to show that bad and freezing weather conditions can create issues for any vehicle, regardless of the tires it's wearing.

The Navigator is softly sprung and has therefore more body roll compared to the QX80. However, its ESP is set for early intervention, so it takes quite a lot of provoking to get this big SUV out of shape.

Big – these both certainly are. Both can be had in seven or eight-passenger layouts – a no cost option for the Infiniti, while Lincoln charges you for the captain chairs in the second row – and both offer plenty of room. However, the QX80 is only available in one length, while the Navigator can be had in an “L” version, which gives you more luggage space.

As far as interior fit, finish and features are concerned, this QX80 has the Navigator beat. Not only the interior design is better on the QX80, the materials used to make its interior look far superior to that of the Navigator. The infotainment system is leagues ahead in the QX80 compared to the Navigator, as it is easier to control and the screen is much clearer. I also like the fact that Infiniti gives you a heated steering wheel as standard on the QX80, while it is optional on the Navigator.

Both vehicles offer great, comfortable seats, but I preferred spending time in the QX80 more.

As for the styling, to each their own. My wife preferred the look of the Navigator, while I preferred the QX80. I think both are smart SUVs and would look right at home at any venue.

Maybe price can be a deciding factor. The Navigator starts at $75,110, while the QX80 starts at $73,650. Considering the Infiniti has more standard equipment and is slightly cheaper to begin with, it is the better deal.

Honestly, I'd be happy to live with either of these vehicles on a daily basis, so if you're in the market for a large, luxury SUV, these two should be at the top of your shopping list.
